Principles of Psychological Tests

Psychological tests should have components, i.e. the standard, content and the procedure, that made it possible for anybody to administer it anywhere, anytime.

Principles of Psychological Tests

Tests should have norms to compare an individual test score to the score of a known group, who have taken the test.

Principles of Psychological Tests

Test items are of high technical quality prepared by experts, pretested and selected on the basis of difficulty, discriminating and relationship to a clearly defined rigid set of specifications.

Principles of Psychological Tests

Directions for administrating scores are precisely stated, so that procedures are standard for different users of the test.

Principles of Psychological Tests

A test manual and other accessory materials are provided as guide for administration, scoring, evaluating its technical qualities and for interpreting and using the results.
